Meaningful Action on Climate Change, for Mechanics and Other Real People

Auden Schendler
SVP Sustainability, Aspen

Climate change has become one of the biggest problems facing humanity. But our responses typically don't address the problem at scale, even though many solutions are bipartisan. Individuals drive Priuses and recycle cans; corporations cut their energy use; and governments take action, then backslide. But this isn't remotely enough. Solving the climate crisis requires aggressive national policy and international cooperation. What ought we do? And what role might mechanics and engineers play in the solution?
